

In some areas of Africa, wildlife managers say there are too many elephants. Isn't it better to send elephants

We wish that we could ask the elephants this question. If we could, we're not sure what they would answer. But with or without the elephants' input, the answer isn't as simple as it sounds.

South Africa is planning on culling again. The authorities say they have as many as 5,000 elephants too many in Kruger National Park alone. All the zoos in the world couldn't accommodate that many elephants, and even if they could, that would be a logistical nightmare.